RECRUITS

himself in a military manner. In addition he has a fine gymnastic and many other conveniences, that were probably unknown to him in civil life. Gradually during his three or four months stay at the training station, the recruit disappears and a real sailor appears. To himself the change is ever noticeable, but to one on the outside it comes as a matter of course, and only when you see the new man first arrive and then get to talk with him a few months later do you realize the benefit the training has done for him. Then he is examined and if qualified is promoted to an ordinary seaman. Then the recruit has his first real event since enlisting. This means that as he is soon to be sent to a real cruising ship and dreams of seeing the world comes true. This event overshadows all others until the new sailor is finally stationed on board his new ship.

"Yes," said Mr. Golden, "an enlisted man can get a commission in the navy and I have served with several officers that were blue jackets with me before."

A Yuletide - Home-Coming By Charles McCabe

HE club looked just the very thing Gerald Mansley was craving for—a sense of home. A few lines read accidentally in an out-of-date newspaper had made him restless with longing for the old scenes. And so he had traveled two days and nights in a sleeper, vaguely connecting his journey's end with all the love and friendship his starved nature was demanding.

When he arrived at his old club on a chilly, gray Christmas morning, it was only to find that fifteen years' silent absence had been too severe a test for friendship. The place was empty of all but servants, and they wore strange, unwelcome faces.

He stood at the club window, looking out on the desolate, deserted street which he had always remembered as being thronged, and a great sadness swept over him.

This was not what he wanted. From his pocket he drew out the scrap of paper which had really brought him so many miles, and looked at it bitterly. It was only a death announcement cut from a paper of a year ago, and ran in the usual way—"Michael Townley, at his residence," etc.

In fancy he saw a sweet-faced maiden, who sought her happiness only in the eyes of the youth by her side. There were joy-bells there, too, as they left the church with the fragrance of mutual love about them.

The bells pealed on outside, and willing fancy led him still further into the realm of "might have been."

In an instant he made up his mind to visit once more the old-fashioned cottage not many miles away, to which he had hoped fifteen years before to take a bride. He would go and see it, even if its neglected condition only added to his loneliness and pain.

Two hours later he was striding through the crisp country air along a winding path which led to a rambling, ivy-covered cottage.

As the last turn brought him in sight of the house he stopped in surprise. He had expected to see dirt, ruin, and decay, but instead he looked upon a trim, well-kept cottage and a soft, crooning song in a voice which reawakened the tender memories of long ago, came floating through the unlocked door.

Half believing that it must be fancy leading him still, he entered the house softly, and, following the voice, went into the inner room, and stood in the glow of the warm firelight.

The sweet, tired-faced, middle-aged singer turned as his shadow fell across the light, and then stood white and trembling.

"Gerald!" she whispered. "Gerald! have you come to reproach me? Not today! Not today!"

The strong man's voice broke as he held out his arms.

"Nance!" he cried joyfully. In a moment she was crushed, sobbing, to his breast in a voice which was very good. "I thought you must be dead."

For several moments they stood thus, the strong man's tears falling on her grey-tinged hair. Then he gently put her into a chair.

"You are not alone," he asked as his eyes caught sight of a little table laid for two, daintily spread with Christmas fare.

"Yes," he answered. "I am quite alone. I have often come down here."

"But you are expecting somebody?" he said, calling attention to the table.

She flushed prettily, looking almost as young as she had in his dreams of the morning, as she replied:

"I was expecting you, Gerald."

He smiled happily at her; then the smile faded, and he sighed as he sank into a chair.

"This is all foolishness, Nance," he said sadly. "You could not live here in the old days, you could do so less now, and I could not live here on another man's thousands."

A smile hovered over the woman's face as she fitted here and there, busily preparing things for a meal. Then she slipped behind a chair, and leaning over whispered with burning cheeks:

"Perhaps you do not know, Gerald, that—Mr. Townley's money goes back to his family if—if I marry again."

The man sprang to his feet and took her into his strong arms again. "It is not too late," he cried. "We are still young. Will you let me try to make you happy?"

Her answer was drowned in the burst of Christmas bells that pealed from the village church close by. But he did not need her words; he could see her eyes.
